own day. Charles Reade's Masterpiece. The first version of that brilliant study in historical romance "The Cloister and the Hearth" was published serially in "Once a Week" under the title of "A Good Fight." We believe that it was also brought out here in one of the Harper periodicals. Not until this seaon has it been published in England as a separate book, the author having promptly expanded his story into the remarkable novel which is, in truth, a classic. Now the Clarendon Press has brought out "A Good Fight," with Keene's original illustrations and an interesting introduction by Mr. Andrew Lang. That the end of this story in "Once a Week" was "premature and unexpected" Mr. Lang thinks was likely; and it is hinted that it is more than possible that the readers of the periodical did not care for the tale. Mr. Lang, by the way, has been searching all available records about Erasinus, whom the novelist presents as the son of Marparet and Gerard, but he has found nothing that allies in the great man's history to the romance.

Reade's Jealousy. In the just published work devoted to Russell, the famous war correspondent, there is an odd paragraph about Charles Reade had an unappeasable appetite for praise. Every fragment of praise that was not offered to him he regarded as a lost of offered to another it was a robournity—offered to another the said and the saked me, "Are you a great iriend of Thackeray's" "I suppose the said. "I said. "I am very much attached to him and he is very kind to me." "You have not known him very long?" he asked. It is impossible to give an idea of the insinuation, and yet heade was not in the least ill-natured. But he was jealous.

Mr. Augustine Birrell presided the ether evening over the celebration by the Boz Club of London of the ninetyninth birthday of Charles Dickens. Mr. Birrell referred to the article in the "Dictionary of National Biography," in which it was stated that the author of Pickwick" especially appealed to the half educated. He contrasted with this criticism the verdict of Macaulay, who recognized in "Pickwick" "the hand of a master." Then there was Lord Acton, a man of stupendous learning, who B Mr. Birrell found, was not only his ental in his knowledge of the spirit of speaker hoped that it would be found possible to amend the law of copyright in such a way as to do justice to such exceptional cases as that of Dickens. and to make some recompense for the enormous debt which his countrymen owed to so great a man.

Mr. Andrew Lang, who is one of the committee in charge of the Dickens Stamp Testimonial, is even more vigorous on copyright than is Mr. Birrell. "It is an infamy," he says, 'that Dickens's granddaughters, through the law of copyright, should be so very poor and, if one could make the public aware of it, it would not be."

The Child Kipling.

The recent death of Mr. Kipling's father has recalled a characteristic story of father and son. We are told that when Rudvard was twelve years old he went on a sea voyage with his parent. The elder Kipling became very seasick and went below, leaving the ingster to himself. Presently was a great commotion overhead, and one of the ship's officers rushed down and banged at Mr. Kipling's door. "Mr. Kipling," he called out, "Your boy has crawled out on the yard-arm, and if he ets go he'll drown." "Yes," said Mr. Kipling, glad to know that nothing serious was the matter, "but he won't Reports have been current in the financial district during the last day or so that George J. Gould contemplated withdrawing from the agreement entered into by him a month ago with the Kuhn, Loeb-Rockefeler-Deutsche Bank interests in Missourl Pacific, under which the stock owned by all voted at the annual meeting for the election of a board of directors in which the Gould holdings would be represented by four diterests by nine directors. If Mr. Gould entertained any such intention, as there is ground for supposing, he has now abandoned it, since it was authoritatively said yesterday afternoon that his holdings would be voted with those of the other large interests in accordance with the terms of the agreement, the formal statement of which was issued by Mr. Gould himself, Febru-

night in which he denied that his brother, George, was trying to recede from his agreement. He also said that the report to this effect undoubtedly grew out of his, Fronk's, activities. The statement follows
